A Lesson from George Floyd
"A man was lynched today"

By Nick Mitchell, Ph.D.

I believe in the power of words and the necessity of describing events accurately. Words provide the means to meaning; and, too often, we bury the truth in euphemisms and abstractions. As Louisiana and the country stand at a turning point regarding our national character, each of us has the responsibility to speak the truth. The truth is that it is remiss of us to call what happened to George Floyd a murder. It was not a murder. The truth is that we are no longer going wrong or crime of passion. He was killed in the most public manner imaginable, but he was not murdered. That description is inadequate for what he endured in his final moments. We have a word in English for what was done to Floyd—lynching. George Floyd was lynched on May 25, 2020, in Minneapolis, Minnesota.

Some may argue that people must be understanding of the difficult job that police must do in day and day out. I do not dispute that policing is a difficult and dangerous job where police officers routinely see the brutality that humans can inflict on one another; nor do I dispute that many police officers are good and decent people. Yet, this is irrelevant to the issue of police brutality—especially in instances where police are lynching and murdering the world to see. The police and the criminal justice system as a whole must be held accountable, because we as a society have consented to give these power to have the power to take a life if the situation warrants. Such power necessities strict accountability. The Roman poet Juvenal famously wrote “Who will watch the watchmen?” In Louisiana and the country as a whole, it is the right of the citizenry to hold the watchmen accountable, because even they are accountable to the same laws as the rest of us.

Is it any wonder, then, that thousands of Americans have taken to the streets in demonstration against legislation that allows American men to be lynched? The First Amendment states that “the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances” shall not be infringed. The grievance is the continued state-sanctioned racism that inflicts suffering on black people fifty-two years after the collapse of Jim Crow. The extrajudicial murders were supposed to end then. Clearly, they have not.

One function of racism is to do violence and be able to ignore the screams as you let it be. It is easy to dismiss racism as the product of ignorant and poor people, but racism requires all levels of society to make an impact. So, while we focus on the actions of our police officers in Minneapolis, let us never forget that Jim Crow was created by educated men and women of means. Let us never forget that while the Ku Klux Klan may be popular in poor areas, it was formed by college-educated men who knew their Greek and Latin—the word “sukos” means circle in Greek. Racism and the terrorism it breeds appeal to both the man and the statue. Terrorism is no new to American Life, although many of us like to think of that way. For African Americans, it is Emmett Till or Alton Sterling or Breonna Taylor, the specter of terrorism is of old age and intergenerational. African Americans across the country, including in New Orleans, were subject to pogroms, bombings, and lynchings well into the 20th century for such grievous offenses as swimming in a lake, a black boxer beating a white one in a heavyweight title bout, and competing for jobs. During the depths of black life in Jim Crow America, the NAACP would hang a black banner emblazoned with white letters that read “A Man Was Lynched Yesterday” every time a lynching occurred in the United States. A lynching was ultimately to be a warning to things come and how easy it would be to kill anyone who disrupts the status quo. Now is not the time to look away or try to explain away what happened in Minneapolis with equivocations and abstractions. As Louisiana and the country stand at a turning point regarding our national character, each of us has the responsibility to speak the truth. The truth is that it is remiss of us to call what happened to George Floyd a murder. It was not a murder. The truth is that we are no longer going wrong or crime of passion. He was killed in the most public manner imaginable, but he was not murdered. That description is inadequate for what he endured in his final moments.
